

A traveler's guide to Paris:

A few months ago, I visited Paris, the beautiful capital of France. I already visited Paris multiple times, but this time I wanted to experience the city from its lesser-known side.

The first destination I visited on the day of my arrival was the Patheon. An impressive building with an even more exciting interior. The second that you entered the building you knew it was designed for a special purpose, the purpose to be the last resting place of multiple French legends.

The entrance of the building leads you to the main hall. The ground covered in beautiful mosaics; the walls filled with paintings. And when you decide you want to see the real deal, you can go down a spiral stairway to the tombs. Each one with an engraved name of the person inside of them.
